

Russia Eyes Banning Online Anonymity After Deadly School Shooting

May 12, 2021

Nine people, most of them children, were killed and over 20 were hospitalized when a former student opened fire at a Kazan school. Yegor Alejev / TASS

Russia should do away with online anonymity to prevent future repeats of Tuesday's deadly shooting at a high school in the central city of Kazan, the speaker of Russia's lower house of parliament has said.

Nine people, most of them children, were killed and over 20 were hospitalized when a former student opened fire at a Kazan school 820 kilometers east of Moscow. Officers detained the 19-year-old shooter, whose official motive remains unclear but who had reportedly announced plans to commit the massacre on social media.

Related article: 9 Dead in Russia School Shooting

State Duma Speaker Vyacheslav Volodin blamed the "all-accessible internet" for posing a "serious threat" to children in the wake of the tragedy.

Writing on social media Tuesday, Volodin said the legal measures that Russian lawmakers previously passed to shield teens from pro-suicide and pro-violence social media groups “are clearly not enough.”

“There are proposals to move away from anonymity on the internet, which according to the supporters of this idea will significantly reduce the amount of content that promotes violence and glorifies extremism,” Volodin said.

“This needs to be discussed,” he wrote on Telegram, the encrypted messaging app that Russian authorities unsuccessfully tried to ban for two years.

Internet freedom advocates have raised concerns that Russia’s targeting of foreign social media giants with fines or blocking threats may lead to Chinese-style censorship.

Volodin also wrote that lawmakers plan to debate a hastily drafted bill tightening rules for issuing firearms licenses after President Vladimir Putin ordered a review of gun control legislation following the shooting.

Putin’s human rights commissioner has joined several senators in proposing raising the minimum age for license-holders from 18 to 21 in the wake of the Kazan tragedy.

The Kremlin blamed the internet for anti-social behavior among youth after a series of deadly school attacks, including the 2018 Crimean college shooting. Authorities at the time pledged to block social media pages that propagate violence after reports said that some suspects may have been members of “anti-social” online communities.

Original url:

<https://www.themoscowtimes.com/2021/05/12/russia-eyes-banning-online-anonymity-after-deadly-school-shooting-a73860>