

Vladislav Mamyshev-Monroe, Russia's Performance Artist Extraordinaire

His short life as a trailblazing artist is being celebrated at the Here Gallery on Taganka.

By Peter Cheremushkin

August 18, 2021

Curator and artist Andrei Bartenev Courtesy of Here Gallery

The Here Gallery on Taganka has opened a show in memory of one of the most eccentric Moscow performance artists, Vladislav Mamyshev-Monroe (1969–2013). The show is called “The Magic Rainbow Flower” after a children’s book by Valentin Katayev about a multicolored magical flower that grants wishes. The show, a memorial to this unique Russian performance artist, is filled with photographs, collages, texts and works of art.

In the West, particularly in America, the transformation of a man into a flamboyantly dressed woman is nothing shocking and barely out of the ordinary. But in conservative Russia his performances were often met with bewilderment and sometimes even protested by Orthodox Christian activists who objected to “sodomitic” images.

Mamyshev had two favorite women he loved to transform himself into: the American actress Marilyn Monroe and the Soviet star of Stalinist cinematography, Lyubov Orlova. His witty and intelligent transformations were very powerful. Occasionally he would transform himself into Soviet pop singer Alla Pugacheva and show up in venues without warning, shocking the public. But Mamyshev-Monroe wasn't and didn't perform a parody of women. His work was a send-up of the ubiquitous and dominant vulgarity and stereotypes of sexuality in show business.

If Vladislav Mamyshev's transformation into Marilyn Monroe was influenced to some degree by Andy Warhol's prints and might seem derivative, his Lyubov Orlova was utterly original. He was very interested in the image of this most American of Soviet actresses. In one photograph, she is posed against the background of the cruiser Aurora, sitting on the St. Petersburg river promenade with a young sailor she has just snagged. In another she is speaking on the telephone with pursed lips next to an enormous Soviet-style buffet. Or she is lying in her coffin as another Soviet movie star, Vera Maretskaya, leans over her. Andrei Bartenev, an artist and the curator of the show, said that Maretskaya is trying to poke her with a safety pin to find out if the old witch is really dead.

Mamyshev-Monroe died tragically: he drowned in a pool in Bali in 2013. Bartenev, who was also a close friend of Mamyshev, said he appears to him in his dreams and demands to be brought back to life.

Many of the works in the show are by contemporary artists and imitators from Moscow and St. Petersburg, representatives of the world of glamour, people who knew Mamyshev-Monroe for decades and spent many evenings drinking, carousing and misbehaving with him in nightclubs and restaurants.

The photographs are compelling, like Mamyshev in drag with Sharon Stone. Stone looks rather modest next to Mamyshev, who is the extravagantly dressed sultry woman in heavy make-up. Two photographs in the show have never been exhibited before: the artist made up to look like Marilyn Monroe but with his genitals fully visible.

One of the key exhibits is an enormous sculpture of a horse from the collection of the musician Igor Butman. Mamyshev-Monroe painted the cow in ladies' underclothes: her back legs are encased in lacy stockings held up by a garter belt, her udder is covered by something like a bra, and her front hooves are in knee-length red gloves. The cow's lips are painted bright red, her eyelashes are heavily mascaraed, and she has a charming curl under her horns. His cow was part of a Moscow art installation that placed cows painted for the project throughout the city.

The show is a celebration of this unique artist and a delight for anyone who loves all things outrageous — although it must be said that there is already a slight note of the everyday in what once the unthinkable.

The show runs until Sept. 1. For more information, see the gallery site.

Original url:

<https://www.themoscowtimes.com/2021/08/18/vladislav-mamyshev-monroe-russias-performance-artist-extraordinaire-a74827>