

Russia Had 1,500 Political Emigres in 2021 – Rights Group

January 14, 2022

Alexander Avilov / Moskva News Agency

More than 1,500 political activists and journalists left Russia in 2021 due to criminal prosecution or political pressure, according to a pro-democracy NGO's estimate cited by Russian media Thursday.

The U.S.-based Free Russia Foundation — which Russia blacklisted as an “undesirable organization” in 2019 — said its figure excludes family members or those who had left Russia for other, non-political reasons.

Related article: 5 Million Russian Citizens Left Russia Under Putin

The wave of political emigration began in spring 2021 as Russian security forces targeted people who had attended rallies in support of jailed Kremlin critic Alexei Navalny, the Znak.com news website reported, citing Free Russia.

A growing number of Navalny-linked opposition figures have fled Russia in the months following a court ruling that outlawed the opposition leader's political and activist networks as "extremist." Several criminal cases have been opened against Navalny's associates and at least one network coordinator has been jailed under the charges.

Several journalists and opposition activists have also left the country amid the widening crackdown on dissent.

"The wave [of emigration] began to grow," Free Russia project manager Anton Mikhalschuk was quoted as saying.

"Then they went by segments: they pressure Navalny supporters to leave, they pressure journalists to leave, they pressure human rights activists to leave," he added.

Mikhalschuk named the ex-Soviet republics of Georgia, Lithuania and Ukraine as the most popular destinations for Russia's political emigres.

A study of official statistics published in October 2021 estimated that 5 million Russians have left the country during the 20 years of President Vladimir Putin's rule.

Original url:

<https://www.themoscowtimes.com/2022/01/14/russia-had-1500-political-emigres-in-2021-rights-group-a76042>