

U.S. Announces First Sanctions After Russia Recognizes Ukraine Separatists

By AFP

February 21, 2022

U.S. President Joe Biden previously promised swift and severe sanctions against Russia if its military forces enter Ukraine. White House

The United States on Monday announced financial sanctions against rebel territories freshly recognized by Russia in eastern Ukraine and warned that more were ready if necessary.

President Joe Biden will issue an executive order to "prohibit new investment, trade, and financing by U.S. persons to, from, or in the so-called DNR and LNR regions of Ukraine," White House Press Secretary Jen Psaki said, referring to the breakaway regions of Donetsk and Luhansk.

The order will "provide authority to impose sanctions on any person determined to operate in those areas of Ukraine," Psaki said, adding that the measures are separate to wider Western sanctions ready to go "should Russia further invade Ukraine."

The two self-proclaimed republics already have extremely limited dealings with U.S. citizens.

Related article: Putin Recognizes Independence of Pro-Russia Separatists in Ukraine

However, the sanctions herald a new phase in what could soon become the most dangerous East-West confrontation since the collapse of the Soviet Union.

Biden has led a coalition of European and other U.S. allies to craft a package of what they say will be crippling economic sanctions on Russia should troops massing on Ukraine's borders start an attack.

While the Kremlin has for weeks denied invasion plans, it has at the same time built up an enormous force of troops and heavy weaponry on three sides of Ukraine.

Putin's speech Monday, in which he declared recognition for independence of the two rebel areas, appeared to raise the chances of invasion.

He charged Ukraine with being a Western puppet, a threat to Russian security, and claimed that people in the Russian-controlled separatist enclaves needed protection.

Moscow has for years been giving the separatist rebels covert financial, political and military backing.

Key questions now will be whether Russian troops will openly roll across the border to defend the two entities and, if so, whether they will stop at the current frontline in fighting between the separatists and Ukraine's government, or push further into Ukrainian territory.

The extent of a Russian offensive would determine the level of Western sanctions.

On Friday, the deputy U.S. national security advisor for international economics, Daleep Singh, warned that sanctions would turn Russia into an international "pariah."

"It will become isolated from global financial markets and be deprived of the most sophisticated technological inputs."

He predicted "intense capital outflows, mounting pressure on its currency, surging inflation, higher borrowing costs, economic contraction, and the erosion of its productive capacity."

Singh said the Western "financial sanctions and export controls are embedded in a broader strategy that would undercut Putin's aspirations to project power and exert influence on the world stage."

Immediately after Putin's speech, the White House said that Biden talked by phone with Ukrainian President Volodymyr Zelensky for 35 minutes.

He also spoke for half an hour with two key European allies — French President Emmanuel Macron and German Chancellor Olaf Scholz, an official said.

The White House did not respond immediately to questions about whether there was still any consideration being given to a suggested summit between Biden and Putin.

Original url:

<https://www.themoscowtimes.com/2022/02/21/us-announces-first-sanctions-after-russia-recognizes-ukraine-separatists-a76502>