

Life Sentence Requested for Russian Soldier in Kyiv War Crimes Trial

By Charlotte Plantive for AFP and Dmytro Gorshkov for AFP

May 19, 2022

Vadim Shishimarin. OLEG PETRASYUK / EPA / TASS

Ukrainian prosecutors on Thursday requested a life sentence for the first Russian soldier on trial for war crimes since the start of Moscow's invasion, AFP journalists in the courtroom reported.

The prosecution asked the judge to sentence the 21-year-old Russian army sergeant to "life imprisonment" for killing 62-year-old civilian Oleksandr Shelipov in the first days of the Russian offensive.

The request came just a day after the landmark trial opened and as two other Russian soldiers were in court Thursday for crimes against civilians.

Kyiv says it has opened thousands of war crimes cases since Moscow launched its invasion.

In court, Russian serviceman Vadim Shishimarin asked the victim's widow to forgive him and described how he shot the man dead in the opening days of Russia's invasion.

Related article: Russian Soldier Pleads Guilty at Kyiv War Crimes Trial

Addressing his victim's widow, Kateryna Shelipova, Shishimarin said: "I know that you will not be able to forgive me, but nevertheless I ask you for forgiveness."

He said he shot Shelipov as he and several other Russian soldiers were retreating to rejoin their units in Russia, saying another soldier had put pressure on him to carry out the killing.

'I shot him at short range'

The soldiers found a civilian car, a Volkswagen, which they hijacked to "get to where our army was and go back to Russia," Shishimarin said.

"As we were driving, we saw a man. He was talking on the phone. He said he would give us up."

Shishimarin said another soldier in the car, who he said was not his commander and whom he called an "unknown" soldier, "told me to shoot."

"He started to say in a forceful tone that I should shoot," he told the court.

"He said I would be putting us in danger if I didn't. I shot him at short range. It killed him."

Judges questioned him in Ukrainian, with an interpreter translating for Shishimarin — who is from the Siberian region of Irkutsk — into Russian.

The killing took place near the northeastern village of Chupakhivka on Feb. 28, four days into Moscow's invasion.

The soldiers then took a civilian captive as they retreated into the forest, Shishimarin said, claiming they did not harm him.

The Russians then "voluntarily" gave themselves up to Ukrainian forces.

'What did you come here for?'

The youthful-looking soldier, dressed in a grey and blue hoodie, looked towards the ground with his head leaning on the glass defense box where he was held as Kateryna Shelipova testified on her husband's death.

"What did you come here for, to free us from what?" Shelipova asked the soldier, referring to Moscow's claims that its troops are liberating Ukrainian territories.

"What did my husband do to you?" she said, adding she had "heard the shot" while getting water from a well.

She then saw a car and "a young man in it with a rifle. I remember him well," she said, referring to Shishimarin.

"Five minutes later I saw my husband. He was dead with a shot in his head. I started screaming very loudly."

She said the incident took place around 11:00 a.m.

"My husband was in civilian clothing. In a coat and trousers," she said.

Another captive Russian soldier who was in the car, 20-year-old Ivan Matysov, told the court that the third unknown serviceman in the car "shouted in a commanding tone" to Shishimarin to shoot the civilian.

Both soldiers — Matysov and Shishimarin — said the third man was not a more senior officer, suggesting Shishimarin was not obliged to follow the order to shoot.

The Kremlin on Wednesday said it was not informed of Shishimarin's case. His lawyer said he had not had any contact with Russian officials.

Original url:

<https://www.themoscowtimes.com/2022/05/19/life-sentence-requested-for-russian-soldier-in-kyiv-war-crimes-trial-a77735>