Finland’s intelligence service is aware of plans by Moscow to incite demonstrations in the Nordic country, the Finnish broadcaster Yle reported Monday.

Citing a secret Russian intelligence report, Yle said Moscow had planned to organize “disruption campaigns disguised as demonstrations” in Finland and Sweden as the two EU members sought to join NATO following Russia’s invasion of Ukraine last year.

The Finnish Security Intelligence Service (Supo) confirmed its knowledge of the unidentified Russian intelligence service’s plans to “incite demonstrations in Finland,” according to Yle.

Supo declined to comment further due to “operational activities.”

Yle reported that Russia's stated goal was to "increase friction" between Turkey and other NATO members in Europe after riots erupted in Sweden against Quran burnings.

Russia's methods reportedly included spraying "as much anti-Islam and anti-[Turkish President Recep Tayyip] Erdogan graffiti as possible in well-known public spaces."

It did not appear that Russia accomplished its plans in Finland, the broadcaster added.

Yle said it has withheld the identity of the Russian intelligence officer who had authored the secret memo and their intelligence unit for security reasons.
