

Rising Egg Prices Show Cracks in Sanctions-Hit Russian Economy

By AFP

December 11, 2023

Moskva News Agency

Russians have voiced concern about the growing cost of a basic food staple — eggs — pointing to the fragile state of the sanctions-hit economy, as President Vladimir Putin seeks a fifth term in office.

Putin has said he would run for re-election in March in a vote that falls over two years after he launched a military operation that led to mass casualties and triggered Western sanctions.

He has repeatedly praised his economy's resilience against the sanctions, but Russians' buying power is shrinking with inflation accelerating to 7.5% year-on-year in November.

And the price jump in eggs — they were up by 40% in November from the same time last year, according to the Russian statistics agency Rosstat — couldn't come at a politically worse time as they are a key ingredient for many traditional Russian holiday dishes.

"I'm horrified!... What's going on with the prices is a nightmare, and not just for eggs, but for everything," 76-year-old pensioner Yelizaveta Shalayevskaya told AFP in Moscow on Monday.

"I used to buy eggs for 70 rubles at the shop, now it costs around 130-140," 21-year-old student Ilya Zarubin told AFP.

Embed:

pic.twitter.com/y95Us16F1n

— snatch (@sna7c4) December 11, 2023

Nina Nevarenikh, a 65-year-old pensioner, agreed that egg prices have risen sharply.

"I do not understand why [eggs] have gone up, but it's a fact... I can feel how my wallet is impacted," she said.

Experts cited in Russian media said the increase was triggered by a rise in the prices of poultry feed and veterinary products, itself indirectly caused by Western sanctions on imported goods.

'Eggs for everyone'

The increase has authorities worried.

General Prosecutor Igor Krasnov launched checks to probe potentially unjustified price increases from sellers and producers.

The Federal Service for Veterinary and Phytosanitary Supervision — Rosselkhoz nadzor — in the meantime authorized the import of eggs from Turkey.

The Agriculture Ministry also suggested a six-month ban on the export of Russian eggs.

In the southern city of Belgorod, near Ukraine, authorities called for calm after people queued for eggs over the weekend.

In a scene reminiscent of the Soviet Union, videos on social media showed people queueing in the snow in the hope of getting cheaper-priced eggs at an agricultural fair.

Related article: The Russian Salad That Never Goes Out of Fashion

"There won't be any shortage... there will be eggs for everyone," regional vice-governor Yulia Shchedrina said on Telegram.

She nonetheless announced to limit sales to 20 eggs per person.

Egg prices are scrutinized by Russian families who are getting ready for winter celebrations.

Eggs are a vital ingredient of many traditional Russian holiday dishes including the mayonnaise-heavy Olivier salad, a staple of the New Year's feast.

Yelena, a 60-year-old manager living in Moscow, was not about to give up on the beloved dish.

"I will make Olivier salad for the New Year no matter what, even if food has become more expensive," she told AFP.

Original url:

<https://www.themoscowtimes.com/2023/12/11/rising-egg-prices-show-cracks-in-sanctions-hit-russian-economy-a83385>