

Branded 'Foreign Agents,' Wives and Mothers of Mobilized Russian Soldiers Face Uncertain Future

By Lukas Žalalis

June 18, 2024

Wives and mothers of mobilized soldiers staged a rare protest in front of the Russian Defense Ministry on June 3. Put Domoi / Telegram

Put Domoi (“Way Home”), one of the most prominent groups of women relatives of mobilized Russian soldiers, has been calling on the Kremlin to return their husbands and sons from the front lines in Ukraine for months.

But when Russia designated Put Domoi a “foreign agent” in late May, the move was still fairly unexpected.

“It seems like loving your spouse and wanting him to be safe is a [marker of] ‘foreign influence’ now. I guess at this point, the only thing the government wants from us is to breed to produce more children,” said Maria Andreeva, one of the few public faces of the movement, who herself was also labeled a “foreign agent” on May 31.

Andreeva said she was surprised to see herself named a “foreign agent,” as she had taken a step back from her activities with the group in recent months.

“My colleagues — including the admins of the movement’s channel — are working from the shadows. ... And while Put Domoï is not registered as a legal entity, the Justice Ministry decided that I should take responsibility,” Andreeva told The Moscow Times, adding that she plans to challenge her designation in court.

“The funniest thing is that I don’t even have a valid foreign passport. And if they checked my bank accounts, they would know there is not a single penny from abroad,” she said.

The labeling came as political differences and increased law enforcement pressure have fractured the group, putting its future potential to enact change into doubt.

Since its founding last summer, Put Domoï has been one of several groups of mobilized soldiers’ relatives making a simple request to the authorities: to let their sons, brothers and husbands who have been on the front lines since being mobilized in the fall of 2022 come home.

Wearing white scarves, its members have laid carnations at the Tomb of the Unknown Soldier next to the Kremlin and other war memorials across the country every week to draw attention to their cause. The movement has steadily grown, with nearly 60,000 followers on Telegram today.

But as it has faced escalating pressure from law enforcement, Put Domoï has turned to other, less risky tactics — and become increasingly critical of the authorities and the war itself.

This spring, the group started calling on fellow relatives of mobilized soldiers to open their windows at 5 p.m. every Saturday and bang on their cookware in what it called The March of Empty Pots.

“Many [Russians] still live their peaceful lives, like I did before,” Varya, the founder of Put Domoï, told The Moscow Times. “Also, there are probably a lot of other relatives of mobilized men who just don’t know how to join us or ask for help. This action is centered around noise, which might wake someone up — not just locally, but across the whole country.”

Varya asked to speak under a pseudonym, fearing that her husband’s life could be in danger if her real identity were made public.

Inspired by the Cold War-era protests in Chile of the same name, the demonstration is designed to be a safer alternative to laying flowers at World War II memorials, which Put Domoï continues to organize.

“The flower-laying is not safe anymore, especially for journalists who helped cover our activities. That’s why now we have a parallel regular action for those who want to seek the like-minded safely,” Varya said.

In the fall of 2023, Put Domoï and several other smaller groups were invited to a State Duma task force on helping mobilized soldiers' relatives.

At the time, some of Put Domoï's members called on officials to swap out their mobilized relatives with fresh troops — calls that tarnished its reputation in the Russian opposition.

"[Officials] told us there was no way to get the mobilized men back without replacing them with someone else," Varya said.

It soon became clear that this troop rotation wasn't going to happen.

"We got tired of empty promises," Varya said. "That's why we left the State Duma task force ... and demanded full demobilization — that's mentioned in our manifesto."

Related article: White Scarves and Flowers: Wives and Mothers of Mobilized Soldiers Take Resentment to the Kremlin

From that point onward, independent Russian media started covering Put Domoï's demonstrations.

The group's rhetoric on its official Telegram channel also started to change, increasingly resembling that of the opposition. By December, some of its posts were openly critical of the war.

On Friday, Put Domoï called on the authorities to replace their relatives on the front line with the sons of Russian officials and media personalities like Kremlin spokesman Dmitry Peskov and state television host Vladimir Solovyov.

"We demand to replace our men with other quite specific men: the children and husbands of those who tell our citizens from the screens that war is good," Put Domoï wrote. "We can make a list long enough to replace every mobilized person."

When asked about this political shift, Varya said one of the Put Domoï channel's main purposes is to give members a place to express their opinions anonymously.

"We are just relaying whatever women are thinking, writing and speaking about — we just publish it on our channel," she said. "Yet our positions might not be shared outside of our movement or among other relatives of the mobilized."

The group's increasingly anti-war stance has sparked a division between members who oppose the war and those who simply want their relatives back.

Paulina, a former member of Put Domoï who now hosts the Mobilizatsia i Lyudi ("Mobilization and People") podcast, told The Moscow Times that she left the movement because she does not actively oppose the war.

"I believe that any anti-war movement in Russia is doomed to fail," said Paulina, who does not disclose her surname publicly. "But if there is a chance to at least demand the cancellation of the presidential decree [on mobilization], I'll take it. If the state wants to keep the special military operation going, it will have to make do with contractors, those who choose to fight on their own accord.”

This shift in rhetoric also amplified the pressure on its members — and on their sons and husbands still in an active combat zone.

Russian commanders “have ‘polite’ conversations with some [of our husbands], so the men start worrying and, of course, argue with their women. Some were told by their commanders: ‘Either your wife shuts up, or we will send you on a suicide mission’,” she said. “So far, no one has been brave enough to look into the seriousness of these threats.”

Law enforcement started showing up at the movement’s public gatherings, initially targeting journalists and later going after Put Domo members themselves.

Officers attempted to detain Andreeva as she staged a solitary picket outside the Kremlin in January.

Then, in early February, police raided a Put Domo event, detaining several journalists as well as two activists. Another five were detained at a Feb. 10 flower-laying gathering in Yekaterinburg, one of whom — Ivan Bukin — had his own father mobilized. Put Domo launched a crowdfunding campaign to cover his fine.

In April, Yulia Demensienko, who had joined Put Domo several months prior, was detained while laying flowers at the Eternal Flame war memorial in St. Petersburg.

“As soon as I arrived at the monument, an officer from the Center for Combating Extremism appeared and asked for my documents,” Demensienko told The Moscow Times.

“They called the police and took me to the police station. On the way there, we were stopped by other officers who started asking their colleagues why they had arrested someone ‘political’,” she said.

“They started calling around and asking if I had any mobilized relatives,” she continued. “As soon as they realized that I didn’t, and that I was previously arrested at a protest in 2021, they took me to the station, charged me with ‘discrediting the Russian army’ and took away my phone.”

Demensienko said she had joined the movement out of solidarity.

“I think it’s vital to support these women. I wanted to show that their tragedy and their pain matter to others too,” Demensienko said. “In the end, they were left to live and raise their children alone. Bringing them up is not only a female duty, but also very much a male one as well. It feels like our society doesn’t get that families need fathers almost as much as mothers.”

Original url:

<https://www.themoscowtimes.com/2024/06/18/branded-foreign-agents-wives-and-mothers-of-mobilized-russian-soldiers-face-uncertain-future-a85319>