Russian courts received a record 20,040 petitions to declare individuals missing or dead last year, the independent news website Medazona reported Monday, citing court documents.

The figure is more than double the approximate 8,600 court filings in 2023, which Medazona said was in line with annual numbers before the full-scale invasion of Ukraine in February 2022.

Journalists linked the surge to the Russian military's apparent efforts to replenish its ranks while avoiding salary payments to families of missing or deceased soldiers. Some court rulings reviewed by Medazona suggest army commanders sought to declare soldiers missing or dead in order to remove them from unit rosters and accelerate recruitment.

Such rulings also allow the military to halt salary payments to families. While salaries continue if a soldier is listed as missing, they stop once a court formally declares them missing or dead.

Families are eligible for 5 million rubles ($50,000) in compensation only if a court separately declares a soldier dead.

Medazona said the majority of the 20,040 court filings in 2024 concealed plaintiffs' names. However, the outlet was able to establish a military connection in 5,090 cases — up from 500 in 2023 and only “dozens” in 2022.

“The courts avoid publicity by concealing claimants and withholding decisions. This interferes with calculations because only circumstantial evidence singles out military cases,” Medazona said.

The report comes more than a week after Medazona and BBC Russia verified the names of more than 91,000 Russian soldiers killed in Ukraine since the start of the invasion nearly three years ago.
