A notorious Russian prison complex that once housed jailed revolutionaries, toppled ministers and Soviet dissidents will be turned into a hotel, restaurants, museum and art gallery after being sold at auction on Friday, the site's new owner said.

Bolshevik revolutionary Leon Trotsky and writer Joseph Brodsky are among the roll call of famous Russians imprisoned at the Kresty prison complex in the imperial capital of Saint Petersburg.

Named after the Russian word for "crosses" — in reference to its shape — the jail's red-brick walls loom ominously over the banks of the Neva river.

However, Russia built a new prison after Kresty fell into disrepair, shut Kresty down and put the historic site on the market.

In an auction on Friday it was sold to the KVS development group for 1.1 billion rubles ($12.5 million).

KVS said in a statement that it would transform the complex into "one of Saint Petersburg's most ambitious urban planning projects."

"There will be a museum preserving the memory and history of the location, as well as a hotel complex, restaurants, galleries and public spaces open to all," it said.

Kresty was commissioned as a jail at the end of the nineteenth century to house imperial Russia's swelling prison population.

It was designed to be the largest and most modern solitary confinement facility in Europe with 999 individual cells.

Before the Russian Revolution in 1917, it housed enemies of the Tsarist state like Alexander Kerensky, who would lead the February Revolution and Anatoly Lunacharsky who would become Lenin's top cultural official, as well as Trotsky himself.

After the revolution, it was the enemies of Bolshevism who found themselves in the prison, especially during Joseph Stalin's 1930s purges when its cells were filled with victims of political repression.

These included the historian Lev Gumilev whose mother, the great Russian poet Anna Akhmatova, would wait outside the walls of the prison in the hope of passing him a package.
