“To Russia and Ukraine, get to the table right now, before it is too late,” he added, citing Russia’s ongoing bombardment of Ukraine.

Since taking office in January, Trump has sought to bring a rapid end to Russia's three-year war on Ukraine. However, he has yet to lay out a concrete plan for how he intends to broker a peace settlement between the two warring sides.

At the same time, Trump's relationship with Ukrainian President Volodymyr Zelensky has grown increasingly strained, culminating in a tense White House meeting last Friday, during which the U.S. president said Ukraine was “gambling with WWII.”

Following that meeting, Trump ordered a pause in military aid and intelligence sharing with Ukraine, saying that “Zelensky is not ready for Peace if America is involved.”

Meanwhile, Washington has sought to restore ties with Russia and arrange a meeting with President Vladimir Putin to push for peace talks. Putin, however, dismissed the idea of making concessions.

“We're not going to do that,” the Kremlin leader said Thursday after a fallen soldier's mother urged him to “see it through” on the battlefield in Ukraine.

“We must choose a peace that suits us and ensures long-term security for our country. We don't need anyone else's, but we won't give up ours,” Putin said.
