

Russian Billionaire Faces $50M Environmental Lawsuit Over Mining Disaster

July 31, 2025

Konstantin Strukov. Donat Sorokin / TASS

Russian prosecutors have launched a major lawsuit against gold mining tycoon and regional lawmaker Konstantin Strukov, seeking 4 billion rubles ($50 million) in compensation for environmental damage linked to one of the country's worst recent mining disasters.

The case filed by the Prosecutor General's Office centers on Strukov's former company Yuzhuralzoloto, Russia's third-largest gold producer, which was recently nationalized.

Prosecutors allege that under Strukov's ownership, the company systematically violated environmental and safety regulations, leading to a 2024 dam collapse that released toxic waste into surrounding waterways and farmland.

According to court documents obtained by Kommersant, the Prosecutor General's Office claims Strukov failed to invest in critical infrastructure, process safety and labor protections, which violated legal requirements and resulted in dangerous incidents.

In April 2024, a dam at the Svetlinsky deposit in the Chelyabinsk region's Plastovsky District collapsed, spilling industrial waste into the Baturovka and Sanarka rivers and contaminating 330,000 square meters of farmland with arsenic.

Environmental damage from the incident was valued at 3.9 billion rubles ($48.75 million), which prosecutors say remains uncompensated.

Related article: Russia Nationalizes Country's Third-Largest Gold Producer

The lawsuit also accuses Strukov, who serves as deputy chairman of the Chelyabinsk regional legislative assembly and is a member of the ruling United Russia party, of acquiring control of Yuzhuralzoloto through abuse of political office and siphoning off the company's income via offshore channels.

Additional defendants include senior officials from Russia's regulatory and investigative agencies, including the head of the Chelyabinsk regional Investigative Committee, Alexei Kolbasin, and two deputy heads of regional ecological oversight bodies, Rostekhnadzor's Yuri Shuvalov and Rosprirodnadzor's Vladislav Potapov.

Prosecutors allege that despite clear evidence the dam was built and operated illegally, these officials failed to hold Strukov accountable due to "informal relationships."

Instead, they allegedly took steps to protect his business interests and continue profiting from environmental exploitation.

After the April spill, Yuzhuralzoloto was fined a mere 300,000 rubles ($3,750) and operations were formally suspended for 90 days. Mining resumed just two weeks later with regulatory approval.

In July, investigators from the Prosecutor General's Office and the FSB raided Strukov's and Yuzhuralzoloto's offices, concluding that safety violations remained unresolved and no environmental remediation had taken place.

The lawsuit also outlines how Strukov is alleged to have secured Kolbasin's loyalty.

Prosecutors say Strukov provided him with a 121-square-meter luxury apartment in Chelyabinsk, covering utility costs, in what they describe as an arrangement that compromised Kolbasin's ability to carry out his duties impartially, ultimately affecting the investigation into the arsenic contamination case.

The 4-billion-ruble claim has been filed with the Plastsky city court, which has already taken precautionary steps including the seizure of Strukov's remaining assets.

Strukov, 64, is ranked by Forbes as Russia's 78th-richest individual, with a net worth estimated at $1.9 billion.

Original url:

<https://www.themoscowtimes.com/2025/07/31/russian-billionaire-faces-50m-environmental-lawsuit-over-mining-disaster-a90045>