A court in the southern Krasnodar region on Monday fined a tourist 30,000 rubles ($376) for recording a video of an oil depot near the city of Sochi after a Ukrainian drone strike set it ablaze.

The video shows two young women and a young man lip-syncing to a song in front of the burning oil depot, which was attacked between Saturday night and early Sunday morning. Authorities in the Krasnodar region said the fire was extinguished 11 hours after the strike.

Law enforcement authorities shared a video on Sunday evening showing the three young people with their faces blurred, issuing an on-camera apology for having recorded and published the video on social media.

The Adler District Court found Karina Oshchurkova, 20, guilty of violating rules during a state of emergency, an administrative offense that entails a maximum fine of 50,000 rubles.

“Oshchurkova told the court she carried out her thoughtless act under the influence of alcohol,” the Krasnodar region’s court system wrote on Telegram.

Authorities identified Oshchurkova, as well as the 19-year-old female and 21-year-old male who appeared in the video, as tourists from the city of Nizhny Tagil, located around 2,300 kilometers (1,430 miles) northeast of Sochi.

At least 12 Russian regions have begun imposing fines for posting photos or videos of the aftermath of Ukrainian drone strikes.

On Monday afternoon, Ukraine’s military claimed responsibility for what it called a successful strike on the Sochi International Airport’s refueling base in the Adlersky City District.
