

Russian Firms Plan Price Increases Ahead of Tax Changes – Central Bank Survey

November 18, 2025

Maxim Stulov / Vedomosti / TASS

Russian companies expect to raise prices significantly in the coming months as tax increases loom, the Central Bank has said, citing its November survey of more than 10,000 enterprises.

Russia is set to raise value-added tax (VAT) from 20% to 22% from Jan. 1, 2026, as well as cut the revenue threshold for mandatory VAT payments from 60 million rubles ($739,000) to 10 million rubles ($123,000) in phases.

The tax changes have sparked alarm among entrepreneurs and business lobbies, who warn that thousands of small firms could be forced to shut down or move into the shadow economy.

Businesses plan to lift prices by an annualized 6.3% over the next three months, up from 4.2% in October and 2.9% in September, the Central Bank survey said.

The gap between companies intending to raise prices and those that do not widened to 23.2

percentage points in October, the highest level since January.

While the Central Bank did not comment on the reasons for rising inflation expectations, in October it partly attributed the shift to the upcoming tax hikes.

Economist Yegor Susin said expectations are being driven by “VAT increases and other tax changes.”

Analysts at Tverdye Tsifry said companies are already preparing to adjust wholesale prices to account for higher fiscal burdens.

Related article: More Taxes for More War: Unpacking Russia’s 2026 Budget

Retailers foresee the steepest increases, with expectations rising to 11.8% after 9.4% in October.

The sector also showed the largest divide between firms planning and not planning price hikes, with a 43.6- percentage-point difference.

Auto retailers followed, with a 38.7-point gap.

The auto industry faces the removal of exemptions on the vehicle recycling fee in December and a 20% increase in the levy from January, measures aimed at pushing Chinese manufacturers to localize production.

Analysts say the changes will also allow domestic carmakers to raise prices.

Expected price growth in the services sector also jumped sharply to 7.9% from 4.4% in October.

Companies reported that cost pressures remain high despite a slight slowdown in input inflation, while demand continues to weaken.

Overall assessments of market conditions also deteriorated, the survey showed.

Even so, the Central Bank’s business climate indicator rose for a second month, driven mostly by improved expectations including hopes for stronger demand.

But much of the anticipated demand growth is expected to be absorbed by higher prices, the CMACP think tank said.

Susin noted that it is unclear whether demand will actually recover — but inflation expectations have already risen, offsetting recent optimism, analysts at MMI added.

Original url:

<https://www.themoscowtimes.com/2025/11/18/russian-firms-plan-price-increases-ahead-of-tax-changes-central-bank-survey-a91167>