Russia has agreed to free two Ukrainian-Hungarian dual nationals captured while fighting for Ukraine, President Vladimir Putin said Wednesday, after Hungarian Prime Minister Viktor Orbán appealed for their release in a phone call earlier this week.

In a meeting with Hungarian Foreign Minister Péter Szijjártó in the Kremlin, Putin claimed that Ukraine "forcibly conscripted" the two men and that he personally made the decision to release them.

"As the prime minister requested, you will be able to take them with you on the plane you arrived on," Putin told Szijjártó.

Hungary is one of the few European countries to maintain close ties with Russia amid its war on Ukraine and has consistently opposed military aid for Kyiv.

Ukraine is home to a large Hungarian minority, most of whom live in the western Zakarpattia region and hold dual citizenship.

The Russian Defense Ministry published a video last week that showed a Hungarian-Ukrainian dual national being held as a prisoner of war, alleging he had been forced to enlist in the Ukrainian army.

During their meeting on Wednesday, Szijjártó also urged Putin not to raise energy prices for Hungary after the outbreak of war in the Middle East sent global markets reeling.

"I came here ... to be assured and obtain a guarantee that even in the midst of the current crisis, the quantities of natural gas and crude oil necessary for Hungary's energy security will be available, and that they will be delivered to Hungary from Russia at the same price," Szijjártó said.

Putin told the foreign minister that "not everything depends on us, but, I repeat, we have always been reliable suppliers."

Hungary is the European Union's biggest importer of Russian fossil fuels, having maintained purchases and secured exemptions from sanctions despite pressure from Brussels.

Szijjártó's visit also came after oil flows to Hungary and Slovakia via Russia's Druzhba pipeline stopped after a Russian strike allegedly damaged the line in late January.

Kremlin spokesman Dmitry Peskov said Wednesday that buyers of Russian oil were "facing blackmail" and accused Ukraine of "deliberately blocking deliveries through the Druzhba pipeline."
