Russian web hosting provider ESTT said a cyberattack that used file-encrypting malware disrupted services across its cloud infrastructure on Sunday.

The company said it had restored 90% of its customers' virtual servers by Monday, though customers still could not access their account dashboards. ESTT said it had found no evidence of a customer data leak and gave no timeline for fully restoring services.

ESTT, whose customers include major businesses, was hit by a large-scale distributed denial-of-service (DDoS) attack in July 2025.

That attack disrupted services at restaurant chains Vkusno i Tochka, Mnogo Lososya, Cofix and Sushi Master, as well as restaurant management software provider iiko, the Vedomosti business daily reported.

The latest attack came less than a week after hackers destroyed the cloud infrastructure of Beget, another Russian hosting provider.

The Nov. 2 outage affected around 500,000 online resources, including government service websites, news outlets and online stores, according to the RBC business news outlet.

The car-sharing service BelkaCar switched providers after its app was disrupted.

The attack also temporarily prevented Beget from registering new Russian domain names.

As of early November, it was Russia's third-largest registrar by number of domains registered under .ru and .рф, RBC reported.
