At least four people were killed in Russian drone attacks on Ukraine's Kyiv region on Sunday, President Volodymyr Zelensky and local officials said.

The bodies of three people were found and about 10 people may still be trapped under the rubble of a residential building that was struck by a Russian drone on Sunday morning in the small town of Dymer near Kyiv.

"Part of a five-story apartment building has collapsed following a Russian drone attack," Zelensky said on X. "I thank our first responders for acting quickly: nine people have already been evacuated, and the fire has been contained."

Local officials said four people, including a teenager, were injured.

Later on Sunday, one person was killed when a Russian drone struck a grocery store in Vyshneve, southwest of Kyiv, the local governor said on Telegram, adding that three people were injured.

Emergency service footage showed rescuers searching through a large pile of rubble, helping residents descend from the damaged building by ladder and crane platform.

At 3:35 p.m. (13:35 GMT), rescuers had to stop their search for survivors because of an incoming aerial threat.

Shortly after, three explosions rang through the town of Dymer, with Reuters footage showing an unidentified aerial object on fire falling from the sky. Civilians and rescuers were seen taking shelter in nearby buildings.
